

Money

January 16, 2014 3:30 pm

Need a job? Brazil says olá (but learn Portuguese first)

By Staff

The Associated Press

Labourers work on constructing Terminals 3 and 4 at the Sao Paulo/Guarulhos Governor Andre Franco Montoro International Airport in October.

Getty Images

BRASILIA, Brazil – Brazil will change its immigration law to make it easier for foreign workers to enter the country and meet growing demands for labour, Strategic Affairs Minister Marcelo Neri said Thursday.

He said the country wants professionals from countries with “linguistic affinities” with Brazil, such as Spain, Portugal, Italy and countries in Latin America.

Foreign workers are needed because the current “situation of near-full employment” could jeopardize the country’s future economic growth, he added. The unemployment rate in November 2013 was 4.6 per cent, the lowest level since 2002.

INFOGRAPHIC: Key takeaways from December’s lacklustre jobs report

Neri told foreign correspondents in the capital that the government will make it easier for highly qualified professionals such as engineers, doctors and technology specialists to work in Brazil.

Last year, Brazil launched a “More Doctors” program that resulted in the arrival of more than 5,000 Cuban doctors to work in impoverished areas where physicians and medical services are scarce.

Neri said the changes would include reducing the bureaucracy involved in obtaining a work visa for Brazil and allowing workers to change jobs without having to request a new visa.

A recent study conducted by the Fundacao Dom Cabral business school found that that 91 per cent of the 167 companies surveyed said they face difficulties in hiring qualified technicians, administrators and project managers.

“The lack of qualified manpower has become a major bottleneck in Brazil and there is no sign that this situation will improve in the near or medium term,” the survey’s co-ordinator, Paulo Resende, told reporters this week.

More Stories

World

Asylum for Snowden urged by Brazilian Senate's Foreign Relations Committee president

- Report: Snowden would help Brazil if given asylum
- One in five Canadians defines success by their possessions
- Ontario businessman reportedly killed in botched car-jacking in Brazil
- Labour shortage predicted for mining industry
- 40,000 people flee flooding, mudslides in Brazil
- Changes made to Temporary Foreign Worker Program baffle stakeholders
- 'Great Train Robber' Ronnie Biggs dies at 84
- The 2014 FIFA World Cup cheat sheet: Group A and B
- Baird says Edward Snowden should surrender to U.S.